Leader Depicts Increasing Marriages Between Jews And Non-Jews As "Kiss Of Death" To Survival Of 20th Century Judaism

A rise in the rate of inter-marriage between Jews and non-Jews was depicted as a "growing menace" to the Jewish community and a threat to the survival of 20th Century Judaism. The warning was issued at an unprecedented "Conference On Intermarriage" by Dr. Mordecai Kaplan, the founder of the Reconstructionist Movement, says the New York Herald Tribune, at the Promenade Hotel, in New York.

Dr. Kaplan told some fifty rabbis, social workers, and communal leaders at the meeting, sponsored by the Commission on Synagogue Relations of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies:

"The truth is that the Jewish people are in danger of succumbing to the kiss of death, and Judaism of becoming a thing of the past."

Dr. Kaplan's diagnosis of what he called a "sick condition" pervading Jewish religious and cultural identity was spelled out by statistics presented to the group by Rabbi Benjamin Z. Kreitman, chairman of the Commission's Research Committee. They showed that Judaism is losing seventy per cent of the children born out of mixed marriages.

The fall-off, Rabbi Kreitman said, is made all the more serious by the fact that the Jewish birth-rate is only 2.2 children per family, as compared with a Protestant rate of 3.8 per family and a Roman Catholic rate of 3.0 per family. According to this data, the number of Jews will be reduced from 2.9 per cent to 1.8 per cent of the United States population by the year 2000.

Dr. Kaplan listed as "the most striking symptoms of what ails the Jewish people and Judaism," the following factors, says the New York Herald Tribune: "The growing menace" of intermarriage; the "self-alienation of the Jewish intellectuals"; and "the frank admission of our great Jewish scholars" that they do not know what a Jew is.

He blamed the "shortsightedness of our spiritual leaders" who assume Judaism will survive despite their own evasion of basic moral and spiritual issues, as one cause for a crumbling Jewish identity at the present time. Other causes, he said, were:

Lack of parental interest in transmitting the Jewish heritage to children; the "Jewish illiteracy"; "assimilationist tendencies" of some Jewish lay leaders; and the lack of prestige attached to some Jewish causes, such as Zionism, and Jewish cultural and religious objectives.

Dr. Kaplan said that the situation had also been worsened by religious competition and divisiveness. Rabbis, teachers, and social executives, he said, have no clearly formulated program for creative Jewish survival, "except the Orthodox, who are most belligerent in their divisiveness."

In a society which expects the individual to look for the spiritual dimension of his life in a group of his own choosing, Dr. Kaplan contended that Judaism has been losing ground, reports the New York Herald Tribune. The desegregation of Jews and their acceptance of citizenship of free societies has resulted in "the disbandment of the Jewish people," he asserted, and "there has been no effort at reconstituting it into an organic society." He continued:

"Jews have no existing people to belong to. We have lost all corporate status. We are Jews only de facto, but not de jure."

Dr. Kaplan recommended that one way to achieve de jure status is the reconstitution of local Jewish populations into organic Jewish communities. This is a major purpose of the Reconstruction Movement.

The communities would not be "self-segregated ghettos" but community associations with departments, such as Vital Statistics, Jewish Education and Culture, Ethical Standards in Economic Life, Religion, Health and Social Welfare, says the New York Herald Tribune. Without such reorganization "all attempts to solve the problem of interfaith marriage are futile," Dr. Kaplan emphasized.

Soviet Scores Germans For Halt On New War-Crimes Trials

The Soviet Government, in a public statement, condemned West Germany for having applied the statute of limitations in war crimes committed during World War II. It declared that the Soviet Union expected the United States, Britain, and France to fulfill their obligations under the wartime four-power agreements and to make sure, says the New York Times, that "all Nazi war criminals" in West Germany were "brought to justice and punished."

It praised the East German Communist regime for having been "consistent" in the prosecution of war crimes and for having decided that the statute of limitations did not apply.

The Soviet statement was made public by Tass, the official press agency. It was the first official Soviet reaction to the West German Government's decision not to extend beyond May 8, 1965, the twenty-year period for opening new war-crimes trials. The decision was made last November 29.

Soviet newspapers have been attacking West Germany on this issue for several weeks, sometimes in exceedingly bitter terms.

The Government statement called the decision not to open new war crimes trials an "amnesty."

It argued that statutes of limitations were part of the legal codes of all countries but that they applied to conventional criminal offenses only and not to war crimes.

None of the wartime agreements between the Allies recognized a statute of limitations for war crimes, the Soviet statement said.

The German Government's decision to invoke a statute of limitations contained in the German Criminal Code of 1871, therefore, was "contrary to present day international law" as well as a "mockery of the memory of millions" of Nazi victims, the statement added.

It said that as long as there was no German peace treaty, the Western Governments remained responsible for the implementation of the Potsdam agreement and other international accords on the "eradication of German militarism and Nazism and the prevention of German aggression."

Leaders of eighteen major American Jewish groups charged the West German Government with evasion of "its moral responsibilities" in refusing to extend the statute of limitations on Nazi war crimes.

The accusation was contained in a letter to the West German Foreign Minister, Dr. Gerhard Schröder, who had refused to meet with Jewish leaders on this issue during his visit to the United States in December.

In the letter, the Jewish leaders also scored Bonn for its "disregard" of appeals to recall West

Although An Intellectual, Eban Fares Well In Israeli Politics

In a country where intellectuality is hardly commonplace among professional politicians, Abba Eban is an uncommon politician.

Where other Israeli politicians practice informality in appearance and scarcely worry about their syntax, Vice Premier Eban is polished in bearing and impeccable in speech, says the New York Times, but other politicians come from farm or labor backgrounds, the grassroots of Israeli politics. Abba Eban comes from neither.

If the kibbutz, or collective farm, background can still be considered the Israeli equivalent of the "old school tie" that distinguishes the ruling establishments in some Western democracies, Mr. Eban is also lacking in that political credential.

Yet the forty-nine-year-old South African-born and British-educated Israeli has come a long way — further, he says, than he had any right to expect — since the time he formally linked his destiny to that of the future state at the close of World War II.

"Intellectuals generally don't fare well in politics in Israel," Mr. Eban says. He is one of the most prominent exceptions. When Mr. Eban returned to Israel in 1959 after ten years as the fledgling country's Ambassador to the United Nations and the United States, he was one of the best known Israeli public figures.

During those ten years abroad he built a reputation as a skilled diplomat, an expert in foreign affairs, and as the "finest Expositor" of Israeli causes. "He can take a cable, an item, and dress it up in the most fabulous way," one of his associates remarks. "Nobody else can do that here."

But the intricacies of international diplomacy are one thing and the intricacies of politicking in a country of immigrants are another. Also, it is hard to judge vote-getting ability in Israel because Israelis vote for party slates, not persons.

But Mr. Eban, stumping the country from end to end, turned out to be one of the biggest drawing cards on the dominant Mapai party list in the 1959 elections, which were his baptism in Israeli politics, says the New York Times. He recalls that during that campaign a member of the audience in an immigrant camp said to him: "I didn't understand a word of what you said, but it was beautiful."

The polish of his diction is not surprising. As a student at Cambridge University he won triple first-class honors — in Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian.

Mr. Eban believes the center of the "struggle for political power" in Israel is inside Mapai. But it is no secret that the long-time party politicians look with a jaundiced eye on the intellectual approach of the Vice Premier.

He is viewed as lacking in natural warmth (his friends call it shyness) and in that indefinable quality of leadership that people in Israel associate with such men as former Premier David Ben-Gurion or Moshe Dayan, the general with the eye-patch, who recently resigned as Agriculture Minister over political differences with Premier Levi Eshkol.

Mr. Eban has been advised to alter his style to conform more to the informality of Israeli politics. But he insists on being himself even though, as he says, there is "a very sharp division between intellectuals and the political community" in Israel.

He contends that the three years he served as Education Minister before becoming Vice Premier destroyed the "Yes-but - he - is - not - rooted - in - our - problems" arguments against him, but it seems nonetheless that about the only thing he has in common with the political professionals is the desire to win.

In the public mind Mr. Eban usually is lumped with the "Young Turks" of Mapai, men like General Dayan and Shimon Peres, the Deputy Defense Minister. Mr. Eban says he has been "trying to fight this biological division" within Mapai because the party "needs a balance between experience and youth," says the New York Times. As for his own political career, he says he wants it to "rest on a broad appeal" and not be linked to any particular faction.

World Zionist Congress, In Jerusalem, Hears President Warn On "Erosion" Of Jewry Outside Israel

The Zionist movement, which created the state of Israel, must save the rising generation of Jews outside the country from "erosion and disintegration," the World Zionist Congress was told by Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president, in the keynote speech made in Jerusalem.

The Congress is the 25th since the movement was founded in 1897 and the fourth since the creation of a Jewish state in 1948, says the New York Times. Dr. Goldmann said to the delegates that the state had never really been the movement's aim but only an instrument to insure Jewish survival.

"The assumption that since there is now a state of Israel there is no longer a threat to our survival is a dangerous one," he asserted. A program to insure the survival of the Jewish people is being considered during the convention.

Apart from 560 delegates from 51 countries, the participants include for the first time 72 representatives of youth organizations and representatives of 26 Jewish communities and major Jewish organizations that are not affiliated with the Zionist movement.

The United States, with 145 delegates, has the largest contingent except for Israel's 190 delegates. The only delegates from the Communist world are two from Cuba. The Zionist movement has been outlawed in Eastern European countries.

Dr. Goldmann called upon the delegates to elect new Zionists to the movement's executive bodies to enable them to help carry out the new program. He also disclosed that the Israeli Government had agreed to cooperate fully, says the New York Times.

He said the emancipation of Jews and apparent prosperity had created a facade that did not correspond to realities.

Actually, he declared, the current period of tremendous social and political conflict, against a background of the danger of nuclear warfare was "by nature cruel, tense, intolerant and not in a very good mood to consider the special necessities of minorities."

He referred to the denial of the right of Jews to live their own national, religious, and cultural lives in the Soviet Union and, to a lesser extent, in other countries, says the New York Times. He also deplored tendencies in some countries to regard communication between Jewish communities and Israel as unpatriotic and to regard Jewish institutions other than religious ones as undesirable.

Dr. Goldmann observed that the Jewish people had survived for centuries without a real fatherland because of a rigid religious code. Now, he said, that form of life has been lost. He declared:

"We have become part and parcel of the life of the other peoples and with that we have lost the main basis of our separate existance . . . The result is that we live in a period where a very large part of our people, especially the young generation, is threatened by an anonymous process of erosion, and of disintegration, not as a theory or as a conscientious ideology but by the fact of this-day-to-day life.

"This process, if not halted and reversed," he added, "threatens Jewish survival more than persecution, inquisition, pogroms, and mass murder of Jews did in the past."

Noting that only fifteen per cent of the Jewish people were living in Israel, Dr. Goldmann said that at least in this generation the majority would continue to live outside that country.

He said such Jews might be induced to remain loyal to their people and resist assimilation if their pride in Jewish achievements were fostered, the religious form of life was strengthened, and they were given the feeling that they are "junior partners" in the state of Israel.

As for immigration to Israel, a Jewish Agency report shows it has been somewhat disorganized because its flow and timing have been determined largely by countries unfriendly to Israel.

The report was prepared for delegates to the Zionist Congress. The agency is the executive arm of the Zionist Organization and is recognized by Israeli law, says the New York Times, as the authorized body for the absorption of immigrants.

The countries alluded to were not identified. Rathbones has been maintained about sources of immigration for fear that publicity would expose the governments which are concerned to Arab pressure to halt the movement altogether.

The report said the number of arrivals since the last Congress in 1960 was 250,000. It listed the origins of only about 30,000 who came from North and South America and Western Europe.

It may be deduced that the 220,000 others came mainly from Communist and Moslem countries, some of which have declined to recognize Israel. Zionist activities are punishable by imprisonment in many of them.

Some governments, for reasons of their own, have allowed substantial numbers of Jews to emigrate. There has been no coordination with the Jewish Agency, which had to pick up Jews at times and transit points not always convenient.

The helter-skelter immigration has prevented rational shipping arrangements, the report showed. Losses were incurred when no immigrants turned up. In Israel there have been months when houses stood empty, waiting for immigrants, and other months when there were not enough completed homes and newcomers had to enter unfinished structures.

Nevertheless, the report noted that 80 per cent of the arrivals were taken from ships directly to comfortable homes prepared in advance, says the New York Times. The others went to relatives or entered institutions.

★CANADIAN JEWISH★ CONGRESS

Twenty-seven Ontario rabbis held an all-day first meeting of its kind, in Toronto, attended by Reform, Conservative, and Orthodox. Two were absent and about half of them were under the age of forty-five years and the great majority were natives of Canada, the U.S.A., or British Commonwealth countries. In the morning the topic was how to develop leadership, and South African-born Rabbi Karpol Bender, of Kingston, presided. Papers were read by Rabbis Morton Green, of Hamilton, and Abraham Babb, of Peterboro. Rabbi Joseph Kelman, of Toronto, spoke on chaplaincy with emphasis on prisons and mental hospitals. The luncheon session took up the problem of mixed marriages in the smaller communities, with papers read by: Rabbis David Kirshenbaum, of London; and Israel Freedman, of St. Catharines, and comment by Rabbis Stanley Webber, of Brantford; and Hillel Millgram of London, Ontario. The chairman was Rabbi Eugene Weiner, of Hamilton. Adult education and work among youth were dealt with later by Rabbis Bernard Baskin, of Temple Anshe Sholom, in Hamilton; Feivel Rosensweig, of Kitchener; and Aharon Feier, of Niagara Falls. The chairman was Dr. S. S. Stollman, Rabbi, of Windsor. A summary was made by Liverpool-born Rabbi Harold Lerner, of Guelph. A paper on youth work was read by David Andrews, of the Toronto Y.M. and Y.W.H.A.; and a special project on "interfaith dating", undertaken in Windsor, was outlined by Joseph Eisenberg, director of the Jewish Community Council there. The following took part: William Stern, and William Morris, of the Hamilton Council of Jewish Organizations; Meyer W. Gasner, president of the Congress in Ontario; Myer Sharzer, executive director of the Congress, Central Region; and Dr. Joseph Klinghoffer, also of the CJC staff who helped to arrange the conference; and Harry Steiner, CJC leader. Among the problems touched on and suggestions proposed were: The practice of individuals divorcing themselves from their local synagogue because of financial disagreement and joining up with a school in another town; the procedure to be followed by the rabbi when Jewish men's and women's organizations arrange functions with "trefa" (non-Kosher) food; the breakdown of parental authority in the Jewish home, the growing barrenness of the Jewish home, and its inability in many cases to transmit Jewish moral and ethical values and ideals; the practice on the part of some rabbis of providing easy conversion for partners in mixed marriages, disfavoured by most, but a few asked for a "re-evaluation" of the traditional rejection of conversion; the question of whether Talmud Torahs can incorporate some information on Jewish "civics" in their curriculum; the gap that exists between the rabbi and the great majority of Jews in small towns, i.e. the disparity in their respective ways of life; Should projects like a Jewish day school be delayed or deferred in a small community for the sake of communal unity? Can Jewish values be transmitted when non-Jewish prestige values are the only ones that command status among Jewish parents? Should each grouping (Reform, Conservative and Orthodox) set up its own regional councils to set criteria and rules for conversions? The conference decided to set up a continuing committee chaired by Rabbi Bender, of Kingston, to evaluate the conference and determine how to implement the recommendations that emerged: a code of ethics for community leadership; an appeal to Congress to undertake a pilot study on causes and consequences of intermarriage in a small or medium-sized community; closer inter-community cooperation on the rabbinical level and in youth and adult education. Miss Florence Hutner was present. Greetings from the Joint National Committee on Community Services were given by D. Lou Harris, chairman. Other Rabbis besides those mentioned above were: Rabbi Abraham Matts, of Cornwall, Ont.; Reverend Dov Edelstein, of North Bay, Ont.; Reverend Samuel Gelberman, of Port Colbourne, Ont.; Louis Grossinger, of Welland, Ont.; Rabbi S. Korolnek, of Galt, Ont.; A. Kremer, of Oakville, Ont.; Harry Mandel, of Pembroke; Rabbi A. Rosenberg, of Sarnia, Ont.; Reverend Michael Shaine, of Chatham, Ont.; Nathan Urbach, of Sault Ste. IN THE VIEW OF MANY ISRAELIS WHAT IS THE WHOLE POINT OF ZIONISM?

The London Times says:

After the first Zionist Congress, held at Basle in 1897, Theodor Herzl wrote in his diary: "At Basle I founded the Jewish state." Few of his contemporaries shared his confidence, but the twenty-sixth Congress, in Jerusalem, is the fourth to be held in a sovereign Jewish state. It took only fifty years for Herzl's dream to become a reality. Zionism now holds its debates in Zion instead of in Switzerland.

The achievement is great, but so are the problems which arise from it. There is still no general agreement on what should be the relations between the state of Israel and Jewish organizations in the rest of the world.

The original aims of Zionism included the encouragement of colonization in Palestine and "the strengthening and fostering of Jewish national sentiment and consciousness" elsewhere. In those days the few pioneering settlements in Palestine needed diplomatic as well as financial support from the outside world if they were to survive.

The heart of Jewish life remained in eastern Europe. Gradually, through the mandate days, the balance shifted. The Jewish community in Palestine became more numerous, and its voice in Congress more confident. The war and its immediate aftermath changed everything.

European Jewry, as it had been known for centuries, virtually ceased to exist. The Jews in Palestine became Israeli citizens, and the centre of Zionism shifted to America.

The argument which goes on now is, broadly speaking, whether anyone has the right to call himself a Zionist if he has not come to live in Israel. The Law of Return opens the gates to every Jew. Is not the whole point of Zionism that this offer should be accepted?

Such is understandably the attitude of many Israelis, who tend to look on overseas Zionists as at best fund-raisers and at worst traitors. The leaders of the Zionist Organization dislike being simultaneously reproached and asked for money.

The loyalties which bind Jews to other lands are strong and, to say the least, not unworthy. The purpose of the Congress should be to help mutual comprehension.

There are, in fact, areas of agreement. Even if all Zionists cannot go to Israel they can train those who do want to go. Israelis and Zionists can show equal concern for Jewish communities in Communist countries, where pressure towards assimilation is great and opportunities for emigration almost nil.

There is a prospect that the present Israel Government may be more accommodating to its Congress guests than was the last, Mr. Ben-Gurion was always one of the most impatient critics of the Zionist movement. Mr. Eshkol is expected to be more tactful. In the current political struggles inside Israel the opinions of world Zionism cannot be ignored.

ANSWER OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS TO CONGRESS EXPRESSION OF CONCERN OVER STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS FOR WAR CRIMES

The Hon. Paul Martin, Secretary of State for External Affairs, in a letter addressed to Michael Garber, Q.C., President of Canadian Jewish Congress, replied as follows to a communication in which concern was expressed about the Statute of Limitations for war crimes:

"I have read with considerable interest your thoughtful letter expressing concern about the Statute of Limitations for Major War Crimes which is due to become operative in the Federal Republic of Germany in May 1965. I regret the delay in replying to your letter, but you will appreciate that because of the complexity of the problem we wished to look into all its aspects as fully as possible before writing to you.

"All Canadians will share your distress at the painful memories which are revived by a continuing succession of war crimes trials which are taking place in West Germany. I agree with you that these trials, however unpleasant, serve a necessary and beneficial purpose. This view is shared by the Federal German Government which, in facing up to its responsibilities in dealing with the unhappy Nazi past, has pursued a policy of seeking out and bringing to justice war criminals who have by various means escaped detection over the years. As far as I know, there is no evidence that the German Government may be attempting to use the application of the Statute of Limitations next year as a means of shielding suspected war criminals from prosecution.

"While there is a considerable backlog of these cases before the courts I understand that proceedings which have been initiated before May 1965 will not be affected by the Statute. I am also informed that if sufficient evidence to create grounds for suspicion of murder is placed before the judicial authorities before the deadline, the necessary investigations and subsequent legal proceedings can take place at a later date regardless of the Statute. This procedure does constitute, it seems to me, a considerable safeguard, since German legal officials have told us that by the end of this year prosecutions will have been opened, or pending, in virtually all cases where massed premeditated crimes were known to have taken place.

"Against this background I have given the most careful consideration to your suggestion that the Government might make representations to the West German authorities with a view to encouraging the amendment of the German Criminal Code to allow continuing prosecution for war crimes involving murder without respect to the passage of time.

"As you have recognized, however, it is difficult for Canada to intervene, particularly alone, in a matter which falls within the domestic jurisdiction of another government. However, I have taken the step of asking our Ambassador in Bonn to make informal enquiries about what the future intentions of the Federal Republic might be in the event that further war crimes should come to light after the May 1965 deadline.

"If the answer is not satisfactory, we will then, preferably in conjunction with other governments, take such additional steps as may then appear to be practicable.

"I shall be happy to keep you informed of the results of our review, and (if you wish) designate one of my officials to discuss this matter with you in greater detail after our enquiries in Bonn".

HOW TO BE A CHAPLAIN PLUS

A group of American Jewish GIs stationed at Verona, Italy, had a first-hand look at some of the history of the Italian Jewish community as they visited the one hundred year-old synagogue with their chaplain. As part of his regular program of religious and cultural activities for servicemen and their dependents, Chaplain (First Lieutenant) Paul Swerdlow took the group to the synagogue and to other Jewish sites in the area.

Chaplain Swerdlow, one of some eighty Jewish chaplains on full-time duty with the U.S. Armed Forces recruited, endorsed, and served by the National Jewish Welfare Board (JWB), is the first Jewish chaplain assigned to the U.S. Army Southern European Task Force, a bi-national NATO command. He covers military installations in all of northern Italy.

With men from his unit, Chaplain Swerdlow met the rabbi of the Verona synagogue, Rabbi Emanuele Weiss Levi, who showed the visitors the synagogue, its Ark, which is several hundreds of years old, a three-hundred-year-old Torah, and other items of interest. He took them to the ancient ghetto section of the city and gave them a lecture on the history of the Jewish community in the area. Rabbi Levi was educated in Turino and ordained in Rome. Chaplain Swerdlow is a native of Philadelphia, Pa., and a graduate of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion.

In his six months in the area, Chaplain Swerdlow has set up a regular schedule of Jewish services for servicemen and their families in cities where there are concentrations of American troops and has helped to develop religious education programs for youngsters and adults.

Very Rare Coins Of Israel Shed Light On History

An exhibition of the internationally known Reifenberg collection, illustrating Israel's ancient history through coins, was on display in Washington in the Smithsonian Institution's new Museum of History and Technology.

The collection was assembled over many years by the late Adolf Reifenberg, who began collecting coins in 1923. Searching the Judean hills for rare stone formations, he found an ancient cave filled with Roman antiquities and coins, reports the New York Times. In later years he specialized in Hebrew coins, making them a basis for the study of Israel's history and a book, "Israel's History in Coins."

Starting with two exceedingly rare pieces struck in Judea under Persian rule, the exhibit will feature the first coins struck by Maccabean rulers at the end of 200 B.C., Dr. V. Clain-Stefanelli, the Smithsonian's curator of numismatics, points out.

"These unassuming little copper coins," Dr. Clain-Stefanelli explains, "proved to be important historical witnesses, and new light was shed through them on the remote history of that period."

In chronological order follow the coins of the Herodian dynasty, which show the increasing Roman influence in Judea. Portraits of Roman emperors appear on coins struck in Judean cities that bear Roman names, such as Tiberias and Caesarea.

The tensions that grew over the years between Jews and Romans led to the revolt of A. D. 66 to 70, when the Roman legions under the command of Vespasian and Titus conquered Jerusalem and destroyed the Temple.

The silver shekels and half shekels and the bronze coins struck by the Jews during these five years of fierce fighting bear the proud legend "For the deliverance of Zion," and are on exhibit with the extremely rare shekel struck in the fifth year of the revolt. Roman victory coins with the words "Judaea Capta" are also on view.

The exhibition, arranged by Smithsonian's division of numismatics, was made possible through the cooperation of Mrs. Esther Reifenberg and M. Avida, director, Cultural Relations Department of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

Mrs. Reifenberg is acting dean of students at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. After the Washington showing, says the New York Times, the collection will be set up in a permanent display at the National Museum in Jerusalem.
